The most useful selector that I used in this assignment was the class selector, because I could reuse .card on my resource items and page sections because it helped me keep the design consistent. It also saved me time, since I only wrote the style once and was done with it. Margin is the space outside an element's boarder, While padding is the space between the content and the border. The box model helped build the background, and the margin helped keep the cards from touching each other. One of my rules overridden another ; which was my p rule that set the text color, but the .note class on some paragraphs changed it, because a class selector is more specific than an element selector. The change that improved my site the most I would say was turning the navigation links into boarded buttons with spacing between them. This made it easier to click and see.
